Heather Angelina Dunn concentrates her practice on domestic and international trademark prosecution and counseling, and enforcement programs, advertising and promotions, intellectual property and art law counseling.

Recently, Heather has counseled clients concerning selection and registrability of trademarks, domestically and abroad; prosecuted trademark applications; counseled and negotiated on trademark infringement matters, domain name disputes, and trade dress matters; represented clients in Trademark Trial and Appeal Board proceedings; and developed and managed large-scale global trademark enforcement programs. Heather has also recently led the intellectual property diligence for Fortune 500 and startup companies, including in high profile mergers and acquisitions, and has advised clients and negotiated for them in brand license agreements. She also counsels clients regularly regarding compliance issues for sweepstakes and promotions, commercial-charitable coventures, and advertising campaigns including in the social media space.

Trademark or certification mark? The standards body's dilemma

10 Dec 2012

When standards bodies look to protect the marks associated with their standards, they are faced with a dilemma: should they use trademarks or certification marks? One may think the answer is obvious: "certification" seems to be what standards bodies do, and therefore a standards body should always use certification marks. But the obvious answer is not always the right one. Some standards bodies find that trademarks better fit their needs.
